German Emperor in a South American adventure which only deserves oblivion. If he has since done exactly what Lord Rosebery would have done in his place, he merits something warmer than soundest acquiescence from the party to which he once belonged. None recognize today nor promises amount. From a partnership with Germany for collecting had debts to an assurance that France would be protected against German aggression, if 'unprovoked,' would certainly be a wide jump. But there never was a more vital 'if' and reckless denunciation of German policy, in Morocco or elsewhere, as foolish as the servile flattery of 1898. The understanding with France is directed against no Power which does not seek wantonly to disturb the peace of Europe, and there is no object which German statements more frequently disclaim.

EVERS in Russia are following one another with that rapidity which is characteristic of revolutionary periods. Eleven months ago, when I wrote in this Review about the constitutional agitation in Russia, the Congress of the Zemstvos, which had timidly expressed the desire of having some sort of representative institutions introduced in Russia, was the first open step that had been made by a collective body in the struggle which was going to develop itself with such an astounding violence. Now, autocracy, which then seemed so solid as to be capable of weathering many a storm, has already been forced to recognize that it must cease to exist. But between these two events so many others of the deepest importance have taken place that they must be recalled to memory, before any safe conclusion can be drawn as to the probable further developments of the revolution in Russia.

On the 10th of August, 1894, the omnipotent Minister of the Interior, Von Plehve, was killed by the revolutionary Socialist, Sasnov.
movement—entirely changing by their move the very face of events. To prevent by any means the 'intellectuals' from carrying on their propaganda amidst the working men and the peasants had been the constant preoccupation of the Russian Government; while, on the other side, to join hands with the workers and the peasants and to spread among them the ideas of Freedom and Socialism had always been the goal of the revolutionary youth for the last forty years—since 1891. Its life itself worked on their side. The labour movement played so prominent a part in the life of Europe during the last half-century, and is so much occupied the attention of all the European Press, that the infiltration of its ideas into Russia could not be prevented by repression. The great strikes of 1896-1898 at St. Petersburg and in Central Russia, the growth of the labour organisations in Poland, and the admirable success of the Jewish labour organisation, the Bund, in Western and South-Western Russia proved, indeed, that the Russian working men had joined hands in their aspirations with their Western brothers.

There is no need to repeat here what Father Gapon has told already in his autobiography—namely, how he succeeded in grouping in a few months a considerable mass of the St. Petersburg workers round all sorts of lecturing institutes, tea restaurants, co-operative societies, and the like, and how he, with a few working-men friends, organised within that mass, and linked together, several thousands of men inspired by higher purposes. They succeeded so well in their underground work that when they suggested to the working men that they should go on mass to the Duma, and unroll before him a petition, asking for constitutional guarantees, as well as for some economical changes, nearly 70,000 men took in two days the oath to join the demonstration, although it had become nearly certain that the demonstration would be repulsed by force of arms. They more than kept word, as they came out in still greater numbers—about 200,000—and remained in approaching the Winter Palace notwithstanding the firing of the troops.

It is now known how the Emperor, himself concealed at Pavlovsky Selu, gave orders to receive the demonstrators with volley-shooting; how the capital was divided for that purpose into military districts, each one having at a given spot its staff, its field telephones, its ambulances. . . . The troops fired at the dense crowds at a range of a few dozen yards, and no less than from 2,000 to 3,000 men, women, and children fell the victims of the Tsar's fury and obstinacy.

The feeling of horror with which eye-witnesses, Russian and English, speak of this massacre surpasses description. Even time will not erase these horrible scenes from the memories of those who saw them, just as the horizons of a shipwreck remain engraved for ever in the memory of a rescued passenger. What Gapon said...

immediately after the massacre about the viper's brood of the whole dynasty was echoed all over Russia, and went as far as the valleys of Manchuria. The whole character of the movement was changed once by this massacre. All illusions were dispelled. As the autocrats and his supporters had not shrank from that wretched, fiendish, and cowardly slaughter, it was evident that they would stop at no violence and no treachery. Since that day the name of the Romanoff dynasty began to become odious amongst the working men in Russia. The illusion of a benevolent autocrat who was going to listen patiently to the demands of his subjects was gone forever.

Distrust of everything that might come from the Romanoffs took its place; and the idea of a democratic republic, which formerly was adopted by a few Socialists only, now found its way even into the relatively moderate programmes. To let the people think that they might be received by the Tsar, to lure them to the Winter Palace and there to mow them down by volleys of riflefire—such crimes are never forgotten in history.

If the intention of Nicholas the Second and his advisers had been to terrifyise the working classes, the effect of the January slaughter was entirely in the opposite direction. It gave a new force to the labour movement all over Russia. Five days after the terrible 'Valentine' Sunday, a mass strike broke out at Warsaw, and was followed by mass strikes at Lodz and in all the industrial and mining centres of Poland. In a day or two the Warsaw strike was joined by 100,000 operatives and became general. All factories were closed, no trains were running, no papers were published. The student movement, and were followed by the pupils of the secondary schools. The shop assistants, the clerks in the banks and in all public and private commercial establishments, the waiters in the restaurants—all gradually came out to support the strikers. Lodz joined Warsaw, and two days later the strike spread over the mining district of Dzierzno. An eight-hours day, increased wages, political liberties, and Home Rule, with a Polish Diet sitting at Warsaw, were the demands of all the strikers. We thus find in those Polish strikes all the characteristics which, later on, made of the general strikes of October last so powerful a weapon against the crumbling autocratic system.

If the rulers of Russia had had the slightest comprehension of what was going on, they would have resorted at once that a new factor of each pettyhood had made its appearance in the movement, in the shape of a strike in which all classes of the population joined hands, that nothing remained but to yield to their demands; otherwise the whole fabric of the State would be shattered down to its deepest foundations. But they remained deaf to the teachings of modern European life as they had been to the lessons of history; and when the strikers appeared in the streets, organizing imposing manifestations, they knew of no better expedient than to send the order: 'Shoot them!' In a couple of days more than 300 men and women were shot at Warsaw, 100 at Lodz, forty-three at Sanemow, forty-two at Gutowice, and so on, all over Poland.

The result of these new massacres was that all classes of society drew closer together in order to face the common enemy, and swore to fight till victory should be gained. Since that time governor of provinces, officers of the police, gentlemen, spies, and the like have been killed in all parts of Poland, not one day passing without some such act being recorded; so it was estimated in August last that ninety-five terrorist acts of this sort had taken place in Poland, and that in very few of them were the assailants arrested. As a rule they disappeared—the whole population evidently helping to conceal them.

II

In the meantime the peasant uprisings, which had already begun a couple of years ago, were continuing all over Russia, showing, as is usually the case with peasant uprisings, a recrudescence at the beginning of the winter and a falling off at the time when the crops have to be taken in. They now took serious proportions in the Baltic provinces, in Poland and Lithuania, in the central provinces of Tver, Nizhny Novgorod, Orel, Kursk, and Tula, on the middle Volga, and especially in Western Transcacausia. These were weeks when the Russian papers would record every day from ten to twenty cases of peasant uprisings. Then, during crop time, there was a falling off in these numbers, but now that the main field work is over, the peasant revolts are beginning with a renewed force. In all these uprisings the peasants display a most wonderful unity of action, a striking calmness, and remarkable organizing capacity. In most cases their demands are very modern and moderate. They begin by holding a solemn assembly of the mir (village community); then they ask the priest to sing a Te Deum for the success of the enterprise; they elect as their delegates the wealthiest men of the village; and they proceed with their carts to the landlord's grain stores. There they take exactly what they need for keeping alive till the next crop, or they take the necessary food from the landlord's wood, and if no resistance has been offered they take nothing else, and return to their houses in the same orderly way; or else they come to the landlord, and signity to him that unless he agrees to rent all his land to the village community at such a price—a usually a fair price—nobody will be allowed to rent his land or work for him as a hired labourer, and that the best he can do is therefore to leave the village. In other places, if the landlord has been a good neighbour, they offer to buy all his land on the responsibility of the commune, for the price which land, sold in a lump, can fetch in that neighbourhood; or alternatively they offer such a yearly rent; or, if he intends to cultivate the land himself, they are ready to work at a fair price, slightly above the new current prices. But rack-renting, renting to middlemen, or renting to other villagers in order to force his nearest neighbours to work at lower wages—all this must be given up for ever.

As to the Cossacks, the peasants of Guria (western portion of Georgia) proceeded even in a more radical way. They refused to work for the landlords, sent away all the authorities, and, nominating their own judges, they organised such independent village communities, embodying a whole territory, as the old estates of Schwype, Uri, and Unterwalden represented for several centuries in succession.

All these facts point in one direction. Rural Russia will not be pacified so long as some substantial move has not been made in the sense of land nationalisation. The theorists of the mercantile school of economists may discuss this question with no end of argument, coming to no solution at all; but the peasants are evidently decided not to wait any more. They see that the landlords not only do not introduce improved systems of culture on the lands which they own, but simply take advantage of the small size of the peasant allotments and the heavy taxes which the peasants have to pay, for imposing rack-rents, and very often the additional burden of a middleman who sublets the land. And they seem to have made up their minds all over Russia in this way: 'Let the Government pay the landlords, if it be necessary, but we must have the land. We shall get out of it, under improved culture, much more than is obtained now by absentee landlords, whose main income is derived from the civil and the military service.'

It may therefore be taken as certain that such insignificant measures as the abolition of arrears or a reduction of the redemption tax, which were promulgated by the Tsar on the 18th of this month (November), will have no effect whatever upon the peasants. They know that, especially with a new famine in view, no arrears can be repaid. On the other hand, it is the unanimous testimony of all those who went to the peasants that the general spirit—the menace, as the French would say—of the peasant nowadays is totally changed. He realises that while the world has moved he has remained at the mercy of the same vynadok (village constable) and the same district chief, and that at any moment, for the mere exposition of his griefs, he can be treated as a rebel, flung to death in the teeth of all laws, or shot down by the Cossacks. Therefore he will not be lulled into obedience by sham reforms or mere promises. This is the impression of all those who know the peasants from intercourse with them, and this is also what appears both from the official peasant congress which was held last summer, and from the unofficial congresses organized by revolutionary socialists in more than one hundred villages of Eastern Russia. Both have expressed the same views: 'We want the land, and we shall have it.'

III

The peasant uprising, spreading over wide territories, rolling as waves which flood to-day one part of the country, and to-morrow another, would have been sufficient to entirely upset the usual course of affairs in Russia. But when the peasant insurrection is combined with a general awakening of the working men in towns, who refuse to remain in the old servile conditions; when all the educated classes enter into an open revolt against the old system; and when important portions of the Empire, such as Finland, Poland, and the Caucasus, strive for complete Home Rule, while other portions, such as Siberia, the Baltic provinces, and Little Russia, and in fact every province, claim autonomy and want to be freed from the St. Petersburg bureaucracy—then it becomes evident that the time has come for a deep, complete revision of all the institutions. Every reasoning observer, everyone who has learned something in his life about the psychology of nations, would conclude that if any concessions are to be made to the new spirit of the time, they must be made with an open mind, in a straightforward way, with a deep sense of responsibility for what is done—not as a concession enforced by the conditions of a given moment, but as a quite conscious reasoned move, dictated by a comprehension of the historical phase which the country is going through.

Unfortunately, nothing of that consciousness and sense of responsibility is seen among those who have been the rulers of Russia during the last twelve months. I have told in my memoirs how certain moderate concessions, if they had been granted towards the end of the reign of Alexander the Second or at the advent of his son, would have been hailed with enthusiasm, and would have paved the way for the gradual and slow passage from despotism to representative government. Even in 1856, when Nicholas the Second had become Emperor, it was not too late for such concessions. But it was also evident to everyone who was not blinded by that artificial atmosphere of bureaucracy created in all capitals, that ten years later—that is, in November last—such half-hearted concessions as a Consultative Assembly were already out of question. The events of the last ten years, with which the readers of this Review are familiar—the students' affair of 1901, the rule of inflexes, and so on, to say nothing of the abominable blunders of the last war—had already created too deep a chasm between Russia and Nicholas the Second,
The January massacres widened that chasm still more. Therefore only an open recognition of the right of the nation to frame its own good faith, could have spared to Russia all the bloodshed of the last ten months. Every intelligent statesman would have understood it. But the cynical courtesi, Bougleyhin, whom Nicholas the Second and his mother considered a statesman, and to whom they had pinned their faith, was not the man to do so. His only policy was to win time, in the hope that something might turn the scales in favour of his masters.

Consequently, vague promises were made in December 1906, and next in March 1907, but in the meantime the most reckless repression was resorted to—not very openly. I must say, but under cover, according to the methods of Von Plehve's policy. Death sentences were distributed by the dozen during the last summer. The worst forms of police autocracy, which characterized the rule of Plehve, were revived in a form even more exasperating than before, because the governor-generals assumed now the rights which formerly were vested in the Minister of the Interior. Thus, to give one instance, the Governor-General of Odessa exiled men by the dozen, by his own will, including the old dean of the Odessa University, Professor Yatschko, whom he ordered (on the 30th of July) to be transported to the province of the Muscovites and the massacres at Bialk and Khatib yourov; the uprising at Odessa, during which all the buildings in the port were burned; the mutiny on the ironclad Knyz Petrowski; the second series of strikes in Poland, again followed by massacres at Lodz, Warsaw, and all other chief industrial centres; a series of uprisings at Riga, culminating in the great street battles of the 28th of July—to say nothing of a regular, uninterrupted succession of minor agrarian revolts. All Russia had thus to be set open revolt, blood had to run freely in the streets of all the large cities, simply because the Tsar did not want to pronounce the word which would put an end to his sham autocracy and to the autocracy of his counsellors. Only towards the end of the summer could he be induced to make some concessions which at last took the shape of a conversation of a State's Duma, announced in the manifesto of the 19th of August.

IV

General suspicion and disdain are the only words to express the impression produced by this manifesto. To begin with, it was evident to anyone who knew something of human psychology. A number of these were enumerated in Le Tribon Russie, published at Paris, No. 40, p. 627.

The Revolution in Russia

that no assembly elected to represent the people could be maintained as a merely consultative body, with no legislative powers. To impose such a limitation was to cease the very conditions for producing the interstesent conflicts between the Crown and the nation. To imagine that the Duma, if it ever could come into existence in the form under which it was conceived by the advisers of Nicholas the Second, would limit itself to the functions of a merely consulting board, that it would express its wishes in the form of mere advice, but not in the form of law, and that it would not defend these laws as such, was absurd on the very face of it. Therefore the concession was considered as a mere desire to bluff, to win time. It was received as a new proof of the insincerity of Nicholas the Second.

But in proportion as the real sense of the Bougleyhin 'Constitution' was discovered, it became more and more evident that such a Duma would never come together; never would the Russians be induced to perform the farce of the Duma elections under the Bougleyhin system. It appeared that under this system, the city of St. Petersburg, with its population of nearly 1,000,000, and its immense wealth, would have only about 7,000 electors, and that large cities having from 200,000 to 700,000 inhabitants would have an electoral body compounded of but a couple of thousand, or even a few hundred electors; while the 50,000,000 peasants would be boiled down, after several successive elections, to a few thousand men electing a few deputees. As to the nearly 4,000,000 of Russian working men, they were totally excluded from any participation in the political life of the country.

It was evident that only fanatics of elections could be induced to find interest in so shameless a waste of time as an electoral campaign under such conditions. Moreover, as the Press continued to be gagged, the state of siege was maintained, and the governors of the different provinces continued to rule as absolute autocrats, exiling whom they disliked, public opinion in Russia gradually came to the idea that, whatever some Moderate Zemstovitschi may say in favour of a compromise, the Duma would never come together.

Then it was that the working men again threw the weight of their will into the contest and gave a quite new turn to the movement. A strike of bakers broke out at Moscow in October last, and they were joined in their strikes by the printers. This was not the work of any revolutionary organization. It was entirely a working men's affair; but suddenly what was meant to be a simple manifestation of economical discontent grew up, invaded all trades, spread to St. Petersburg, then all over Russia, and took the character of such an imposing revolutionary manifestation that autocracy had to capitulate before it.

When the strike of the bakers began, troops were, as a matter of course, called out to suppress it. But this time the Moscow working men had had enough of massacres. They offered an armed resistance to the Cossacks. Some three hundred men barricaded themselves in a garret, and a regular fight between the besieged working men and the besieging Cossacks followed. The latter took, of course, the upper hand, and butchered the besieged, but then all the Moscow working men joined hands with the strikers. A general strike was declared. 'Nonsense! A general strike is impossible!' the pique were said, even then. But the working men set earnestly to stop all work in the great city, and fully succeeded. In a few days the strike became general. What the working men must have suffered during these two or three weeks, when all work was suspended, and provision became extremely scarce, one can easily imagine; but they held out. Moscow had no bread, no coal coming in, no light in the streets. All traffic on the railways had been stopped, and the mountains of provisions which, in the usual course of life, reach the great city every day, were lying rotting along the railway lines. No newspapers, except the proclamation of the strike committees, appeared. Thousands upon thousands of passengers who had come to that great railway centre which Moscow is said to be, were thrown out. Some were housed in railway stations. Tons and tons of letters accumulated at the post offices, and had to be stored in special storerooms. But the strike, far from abating, was spreading all over Russia. Once the heart of Russia, Moscow, had struck, all the other towns followed. St. Petersburg soon joined the strike, and the working men displayed the most admirable organizing capacities. Then, gradually, the enthusiasm and devotion of the poorer classes of society were over the other classes. The shop assistants, the clerks, the teachers, the employees at the banks, the actors, the lawyers, the chemists, nay, even the judges, gradually joined the strikers. A whole country had struck against its government; all the troops, but even from the troops separate officers and soldiers came to take part in the strike meetings, and one saw uniforms in the crowds of peaceful demonstrators who managed to display a wonderful skill in avoiding all conflict with the army.

In a few days the strikers had spread over all the main cities of the Empire, including Poland and Finland. Moscow had no water, Warsaw no fuel; provisions ran short everywhere; the cities, great and small, remained plunged in complete darkness. No smoking factories, no railways running, no tramways, no Stock Exchange, no banking, no theatres, no law courts, no schools. In many places the restaurants, too, were closed, the waiters having left, or else the workers compelled the owners to extinguish all lights after seven o’clock. In Finland, even the house servants were not allowed to work before seven in the morning or after seven in the evening. All in the towns had come to a standstill. And what exasperated the rulers most was that the workers offered no opportunity for shooting at them and re-establishing ‘order’ by massacre. A new weapon, more terrible than street warfare, had thus been tested and proved to work admirably.

The panic in the Tsar’s entourage had reached a high pitch. He himself, in the meantime, was consulting in turn the Conservatives (Ignatoff, Gourevitch, Stürmer, Steinschneider), who advised him to concede nothing, and Witte, who represented the Liberal opinion; and it is said that if he yielded to the advice of the latter, it was only when he saw that the Conservatives refused to risk their reputations, and maybe their lives, in order to save autocracy. He finally signed, on October 30, a manifesto in which he declared that his ‘inexorable will’ was

(1) To grant the population the immediate foundations of civic liberty based on real equality of the persons and freedom of conscience, speech, union, and association.

(2) To abolish the elections to the State Duma already ordered, to call to participation in the Duma, as far as is possible in view of the circumstances of the time, three classes of the population now completely deprived of electoral rights, leaving the ultimate development of the principle of the electoral right in general to the newly established legislative order of things.

(3) To establish an immovable rule that no law can come into force without the approval of the State Duma, and that it shall be possible for the elected of the people to exercise a real participation in the supervision of the legality of the acts of the authorities appointed by us.

On the same day Count Witte was nominated the head of a Ministry, which he himself had to form, and the Tsar approved by his signature a memorandum of the Ministry-President in which it was said that: ‘a tendency towards the abolition of exclusive laws’ and ‘the avoidance of repressive measures in respect to proceedings which do not openly menace society and the State’ must be binding for the guidance of the Ministry. The Government was also ‘to abstain from any interference in the elections to the Duma’, and ‘not insist its decisions as long as they are not inconsistent with the historic greatness of Russia.’

At the same time a general strike had also broken out in Finland. The whole population joined in supporting it with a striking unanimity; and as communication with St. Petersburg was interrupted, the wildest rumours about the revolution in the Russian capital circulated at Helsinki. Pressed by the Finnish population, the Government-General undertook to report to the Tsar the absolute necessity for further concessions, and, the Tsar agreeing with this demand, a manifesto was immediately issued, by which all repressive measures of the last few years, including the unfortunate manifesto of the year 1899, by which the Finnish Constitution had been violated, were rescinded; the Diet was convened, and a complete return to the status quo ante Bolshevik was proscribed. What a pity for the future development of Russia that on this very same day an identical measure, establishing and converting a Polish Diet at Warsaw, was not taken? How much bloodshed would have been saved! And how much safer the further development of Russia would have been, if Poland had then known that she would be able to develop her own life according to her own wishes!

Count Witte having been invested on the 30th of October with wide powers as Minister-President, and the further march of events undoubtedly depending to a great extent upon the way in which he will use his extensive authority, the question, "What sort of man is Witte?" is now asked on all sides.
The present Prime Minister of Russia is often described as the Necker of the Russian revolution; and it must be owned that the resemblance between the two statesmen lies not only in the situations which they occupy with regard to their respective monarchies. Like Necker, Witte is a successful financier, and he also is a "mercenary," his own interests. The great industries, and would like to see Russia a money-making country, with its Morgans and Rockefeller's making colossal fortunes in Russia itself and in all sorts of Manchurias. But he has also the limited political intelligence of Necker, and his views are not very different from those which the French Minister expressed in his work, "Pourvu d'Escaut," published in 1792. Witte's ideal is a Liberal, half-absolute and half-constitutional monarchy, of which he, Witte, would be the Bismarck, standing by the side of a weak monarch and sheltered from his whims by a docile middle-class Parliament. In that Parliament he would even accept a score of Labour members—just enough to render inoffensive the most prominent Labour agitators, and to have the claims of Labour expressed in a parliamentary way.

Witte is daring, he is intelligent, and he is possessed of an admirable capacity for work; but he will not be a great statesman because he seeks at those who believe that in politics, as in everything else, complete honesty is the most successful policy. In the polemics which Herbert Spencer carried on some years ago in favour of "principles" in politics, Witte would have joined, I suppose, his opponents; and I am afraid he secretly worships the "almighty dollar policy" of Cecil Rhodes. In Russia he is thoroughly discussed. It is very probable that people attribute to him more power over Nicholas the Second than he has in reality, and do not take sufficiently into account that Witte must continually be afraid of asking too much from his master, from fear that the master will turn his back on him, and throw himself at the first opportunity into the hands of his reactionary advisers, general policy, an honest general amnesty was granted as a guarantee of good faith. Even that pledge was refused to Russia. And so it is all round. All that has hitherto been done are words, words, and words! And every one of these words can be crossed with a stroke of the pen, just as the promises of a Constitution given by the Austrian Emperor after the Vienna revolution of the 13th of March, 1848, were cancelled a few months later, and the population of the capital was massacred as soon as its revolutionary spirit cooled down. Is it not the same policy that is coveted at Tarasov's Soho? Unfortunately, the first step in the way of reaction has already been made by proclaiming the state of siege in Poland.

VI

The first victory of the Russian nation over autocracy was met with the wildest enthusiasm and jubilation. Crowds, composed of hundreds of thousands of men and women of all classes, all mixed together, and carrying countless red flags, moved about in the streets of the capitals, and the same enthusiasm rapidly spread to the provinces, down to the smallest towns. True that it was not jubilation only; the crowd expressed also three distinct demands. For three days after the publication of the manifesto in which autocracy had abdicated its powers, no amnesty manifeste had yet appeared, and on the 8th of November, at St. Petersburg, a crowd, 100,000 men strong, was going to storm the House of Detention, when, at ten in the evening, one of the Workmen's Council of Delegates addressed them, declaring that Witte had just given his word of honour that a general amnesty would be granted that same night. The delegate therefore said:

'Spare your blood for graver occasions. At eleven we shall have Witte's reply, and if it is not satisfactory, then to-morrow at six you will all be informed as to how and where to meet in the streets for further action.' And the immense crowd—I hold these details from an eye-witness—slowly broke up and dispersed in silence, thus recognizing the new power—the Labour Delegates—which was born during the strike.

Two other important points, beside amnesty, had also to be cleared up. During the last few months the Cossacks had proved to be the most abominable instrument of reaction, always ready to whip, shoot, or bayonet unarmed crowds, for the mere fun of the sport and with a view to subsequent pillage. Besides, there was no guarantee whatever that at any moment the demonstrators would not be attacked and slaughtered by the troops. The people in the streets demanded therefore the withdrawal of the troops, and especially of the Cossacks, the abolition of the state of siege, and the creation of popular militias which would be placed under the management of the municipalities.

It is known how, at Odessa first, and then all over Russia, the jubilant crowds began to be attacked by bands, composed chiefly of butcher assistants, and partly of the poorest slum-dwellers, sometimes armed, and very often under the leadership of policemen and police officials in plain clothes; how every attempt on behalf of the Radical demonstrators to resist such attacks by means of revolver-shots immediately provoked volleys of rifle fire from the Cossacks; how peaceful demonstrators were slaughtered by the soldiers, after some isolated pistol-shot—maybe a police signal—was fired from the crowd; and how, finally, at Odessa an organised pillage and the slaughter of men, women, and children in some of the poorest Jewish suburbs took place, while the troops fired at the improvised militia of students who tried to prevent the massacre, or to put an end to them. At Moscow, the editor of the Moscow Gazette, Gringmouth, and part of the clergy, stimulated by a pastoral letter of Bishop Nikon, openly pressed 'to put down the intellectuals by force,' and improvised routers spoke from the platform in front of the Desis Virgin, preching the killing of the students. The result was that the University was besieged by crowds of the 'defenders of order,' the students were fired at by the Cossacks, and for several nights in succession isolated students were assasinated in the dark by the Moscow Gazette men, so that in one single night twenty-one were killed or mortally wounded.

An inquest into the origin of these murders is now being made by volunteer lawyers; but this much can already be said. If race-hatred has played an important part at Odessa and in other southern towns, no such cause can be alleged at Moscow, Tver (the burning of the house of the Zemstvo), Tomsk, Nijni-Novgorod, and a great number of towns having a purely Russian population. And yet outbreaks having the same savage character took place in all these towns and cities at about the same time. An organised band is seen in them, and there is no doubt that this is the hand of the Monarchist party. It sent a deputation to Peterhof, headed by Prince Scherbatoff and Count Sheremeteff, and after the deputation had been most sympathetically received by Nicholas the Second, they openly came forward in the Moscow Gazette and in the appeals of the bishops Nikon and Nkandere, calling upon their sympathisers to declare an open war on the Radicals.

Of course it would be unwise to imagine that autocracy, and the autocratic habits which made a little Tartar of every police official in his own sphere, would die out without showing resistance by all means, including murder. The Russian revolution will certainly have its Feuillante and its Mazzinis. And this struggle will necessarily be complicated in Russia by race-hatred. It has always been the policy of the Russian Tsardom to stir national hatred, setting the
The Nineteenth Century Dec.

Finnos and the Karelian peasants against the Swedes in Finland, the Latvias against the Germans in the Baltic provinces, the Polish peasants (partly Ukrainian) against the Polish landlords, the Orthodox Russians against the Jews, the Mennonites against the Armenians, and so on. Then, for the last twenty years it has been a notable feature of the policy of Ignatieff, and later on of Plehve, to provoke race-wars with a view of checking Socialist propaganda. And the police in Russia have always taken advantage of all such outbreaks for pillaging and plundering. Consequently, a few hints from above were enough—and several reactionary papers and two bishops went so far as to openly give such hints—to provoke the terrible massacres at Odessa, and the smaller outbreaks elsewhere.

Such conflicts between the representatives of a dark past and the young forces representing the future will certainly continue for some time before the mighty floods raised by the storm of the revolution will subside. The Revolution in England lasted from 1649 to 1660; that of France from 1788 till 1794, and both were followed by an unsettled period of some thirty years' duration. So we cannot expect that the Russian revolution should accomplish its work in a few months only. One extremely important feature has, however, to be noted already now. Up to the present moment, bloodshed has come, not from the Revolutionists, but from the defenders of Absolutism. It is estimated that more than 20,000 persons have already been killed in Russia since January last. But all this mass of murders lies on the side of the defenders of autocracy. The victory over Absolutism which compels it to abdicate was obtained by a strike, unique in the annals of history by its unanimity and the self-abnegation of the workers; but no blood was shed to win this first victory. The same is true of the villages. It may be taken as certain that the landlord ownership of the land has already sustained a blow which renders a return to the status quo ante in land-ownership materially impossible. And this other victory—a very great one, in my opinion—is being obtained again without bloodshed on behalf of the revolted peasants. If blood is shed, it is shed by the troops called in for the defence of the monopoly in land—not by those who endeavour to get rid of it. As to the peasants, they have even pronounced themselves against retaliation.

Another prominent feature of the Russian revolution is the ascendancy which Labour has taken in it. It is not Social Democrats, or Revolutionary Socialists, or Anarchists, who take the lead in the present revolution. It is Labour—the working men. Already during the first general strike, the St. Petersburg working men had nominated 152 delegates, who constituted a 'Council of the Union of Working Men,' and these delegates had nominated an executive of eight members. Nobody knew their names or their addresses, but their advice was obeyed like orders. In the streets they appeared surrounded by fifty or sixty working men, armed, and linked together so as to allow no one to approach a delegate. Now, the working men of St. Petersburg have apparently extended their organisation, and while their delegates confer with representatives of the revolutionary parties, they nevertheless retain their complete independence. Similar organisations most probably have sprung up at Moscow and elsewhere, and at this moment the working men of St. Petersburg are systematically arming themselves in order to resist the absolutist Black Guards. As to the powers of the Labour organisation, they are best seen from the fact that while the barristers lawyers are still connecting some crooked Press law, the working men have abolished preventive censorship at St. Petersburg by publishing a short-worded resolution in their clandestine daily, the Soveto of the Council of Labour Delegates. We declare, they said, 'that if the editor of any paper continues to send his sheet to the Censor before issuing it, the paper will be confiscated by us in the streets, and the printers will be called out from the printing office (they will be supported by the Strike Committee). If the paper continues nevertheless to appear, the blackleg will be boycotted by us, and the press will be broken.' This is how preliminary censorship has ceased to exist at St. Petersburg. The old laws remain, but de facto the daily press is free.

Many years ago the general strike was advocated by the Latin working men as a weapon which would be irresistible in the hands of Labour for imposing its will. The Russian revolution has demonstrated that they were right. Moreover, there is not the slightest doubt that if the general strike has been capable of forcing the centuries-old institution of Autocracy to capitulate, it will be capable also of imposing the will of the labourers upon Capital; and that the working men, with the common-sense of which they have given such striking proofs, will find also the means of solving the Labour problem, so as to make industry the means, not of personal enrichment, but of satisfying the needs of the community. That the Russian revolution will not limit itself to a mere reform of political institutions, but, like the Revolution of 1848, will make an attempt, at least, to solve the social problem, has always been my opinion. Half a century of Socialist evolution in Europe cannot remain without influence upon the coming events. And the dominant position taken by Labour in the present crisis seems to yield support to that provision. How far the social change will go, and what concrete forms it will take, I would not undertake to predict without being on the spot, in the midst of the workers; but steps in that direction are sure to be made.

1 I take this resolution, sightly condensing it, from the Journals of November 4—the day when the first free papers appeared openly at St. Petersburg.

Vet. LVIII.—No. 346 89
To say that Russia has begun her great revolution is no longer a metaphor or a prophecy; it is a fact. And one is amazed to discover how history repeats itself; not in the events, of course, but in the psychology of the opposed forces. The governing class, at any rate, have learned nothing. They remain incapable of understanding the real significance of events which are sensed from their eyes by the artificiality of their surroundings. Where a timely yielding, a frank, open-minded recognition of the necessity of new forms of life would have spared the country torrents of blood, they make concessions at the last moment, always in a half-hearted way, and always with the secret intention of soon returning to the old forms. Why have they massacred at least 25,000 men during these ten months, when they had to recognize in October what they refused to recognize in December last?

Why do they continue repugnation and provoke new massacre, when they will have to recognize in a few months honor universal sufragé as the basis of representative government in Russia, and the legislative autonomy of Poland as the best, the only possible means for keeping the two countries, Bavaria and Poland, firmly linked together, just as they were compelled, after having set all the country on fire, to recognize that the honest recognition of Finland's autonomy was the only means of maintaining her bonds with Russia? But no, they will not recognize what is evident to everyone as soon as he frees himself from the fools' paradise atmosphere of the St. Petersburg bureaucracy. They will stir up the bitterest civil wars.

Happily enough, there is a more hopeful side to the Russian revolution. The two forces which hitherto have played the leading part in the revolution—namely, the working men in the towns, fractionizing with the younger 'intellectuals,' and the peasants in the country—have displayed much a wonderful unanimity of action, even where it was not concerted beforehand, and much a reluctance from ceaseless bloodshed, that we may be sure of their ultimate victory. The troops have already been deeply impressed by the unanimity, the self-sacrifice, and the consciousness of their rights displayed by the workmen in their strikes; and now that the St. Petersburg workmen have begun to approach in a spirit of straightforward propaganda those who were enrolled in the 'Black Gangs,' that other support of autocracy will probably soon be dissolved as well. The main danger lies now in that the statesmen, enmauned of 'order' and instigated by timorous landlords, might resort to massacre for suppressing the peasant rebellions, in which case retaliation would follow to an extent and with consequences which nobody could foresee.

The first year of the Russian revolution has already proved that there is in the Russian people that unity of thought without which no serious change in the political organization of the country would have been possible, and that capacity for united action which is the necessary condition of success. One may already be sure that the present movement will be victorious. The years of disturbance will pass, and Russia will come out of them a new nation; a nation owning an unfathomable wealth of natural resources, and capable of utilizing them; ready to seek the ways for utilizing them in the best interest of all; a nation avowed to bloodshed, avowed to war, and ready to march towards the higher goals of progress. One of her worst inheritances from a dark past, autocracy, lies already mortally wounded, and will not revive; and other victories will follow.
